The idea of answering or imagining or feeling one's way into that what are you going through? is a central idea of this slim volume of Rich's poems from the late 1980s and early 1990s: it's there from the very start of the very first poem and keeps coming up. An Atlas of the Difficult World Literature fiction books The first poem the title poem is probably my favorite; it and the other long poem of this book (Eastern War Time) are to me the most compelling because there's room in them for a broadness of experience and/or time a sense of both the big picture/history (industrial agriculture the Holocaust) and the personal and also room for both the horrors and loveliness of the world: (from the first section of An Atlas of the Difficult World): I don't want to know wreckage dreck and waste but these are the materials and so are the slow lift of the moon's belly over wreckage dreck and waste wild treefrogs calling in another season light and music still pouring over our fissured cracked terrain. An Atlas of the Difficult World book pdf (4) Some early favorite lines from the same section of the same poem: voice of the freeway night after night metal streaming down coast past eucalyptus cypress agribusiness empires THE SALAD BOWL OF THE WORLD gurr of small planes dusting the strawberries each berry picked by a hand (3) I like too how Rich writes about nature wind and weather and apple trees and succulents the different feel of different places (a cabin or a brook in Vermont the California coast). An Atlas of the Difficult World book Adrienne Rich Where are we moored? What are the bindings? What behooves us?
